About the Author

Karyn Rashoff earned her B.A. in Sociology and her M.S. in Educational Counseling from California State University, Long Beach, both with honors. She continued her coursework at Chico State University, UC Irvine, and University of San Diego.

She holds lifetime credentials for California Pupil Personnel Services K – 12 and California Community College Counseling.

Karyn has written many articles on parenting, spoken at countless parent nights, and counseled thousands of teens dealing with grief, the pain of perceived betrayal by friends, and difficulties with teachers, parents, and their own ever-changing priorities.

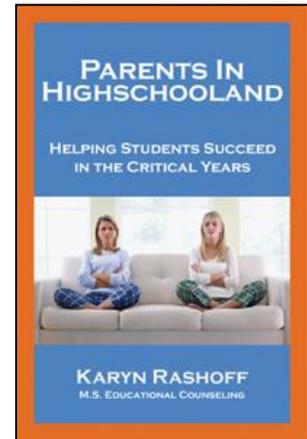

A long-time resident of Orange County, CA, Karyn has a son in graduate school. She delights in singing with three community choral groups and is an avid gardener.

Trying to Figure Out Your Highschooler? Here's a Book You Can Use Tonight.

Parents in Highschooland is built around concrete anecdotes and examples of positive things parents have found successful in their homes and in their direct contact with school officials, teachers, coaches — and, of course, their teens. Tips, interviews, and true stories told by students, parents and educators are demonstrated throughout the book.

All parents want their teens to become independent, confident and ready to take on the rigors of college and the responsibilities of adulthood. This book may be used as a quick reference of ideas for parents who are long-term planners with a child just beginning the educational process, as well as for parents in the throes of the usual tasks of watching their teen grow up.

Thanks to her 33 years of dedicated work as a high school guidance counselor — a career that included nearly 20,000 documented counseling interactions with students, parents, teachers and administrators — few education professionals are better qualified than author Karyn Rashoff to identify, analyze and resolve the complex and usually conflict-filled interactions among students, their teachers, and their parents.
